The Financial Outlook.

The New York World says: The fact that a considerable number of mills and factories have recently shut down has given the habitual croakers an opportunity to renew their gloomy prognostications as to the future. The scheme does not seem to work well, and in business circles there is apparently a disposition to take a more hopeful view of the general financial and commercial situation. It is well known that the temporary shutting down by the manufacturers and the reduction in wages are both the result of the past events rather than of any new developments in the business affairs of the country. Over production of metals, coal, cotton manufactures, etc., etc., a few years since naturally brought about extremely low prices, and with a desire in all directions to curtail consumption to pressing wants, there has been more or less depression "in all branches of trade. The movement looking toward reduced wages will not, it is confidently believed, cause any uprising of labor for the reason that the necessities of life are now obtainable more cheaply than for many years. These concomitants of the situation will ultimately correct many evils, and, in connection with other causes now appearing, assist in building up trade in various channels.

Since the election there has been a substantial improvement in the dry goods business and the retail business has increased materially. In this and in other branches there is an impression that belt-ropes have been touched, and that delay in making purchases may only result in having to pay higher prices. When this view becomes general there will be witnessed an improvement similar to that noticed in the department of dry goods. The success of the Democratic party has already inspired the confidence among the mercantile classes and the future is looked forward to with cheerfulness, it being generally expected that the future will be so shaped as to bring lasting benefits to the business interests. The recent utterances of President-elect Cleveland Mr. Hendricks are calculated to stimulate this feeling of confidence, and to impart fresh courage to those about to embark in new enterprises. The outlook is certainly more favorable and the shutting down of mills in consequence of troubles dating back several years will soon give place to a more healthy and satisfactory condition of affairs.

The Cowboys' Life.

The whirligig of time, writes a cowboy, from the Indian Territory, has wrought a wonderful change in the occupation of the frontier. When I was a boy, he says, there was six months in the year we did nothing but roam the range over a roaring fire in the snug and roomy dug-out. A feast on roasted turkey and other equally as palatable game was an everyday occurrence. Should a dispute arise as to whose duty it was to prepare the meal, deferred by general consent until hunger drove someone's ambition up to the standpoint of undertaking the job. The overwhirligig of time has wrought a half day's work in securing fuel enough to last for a month left upon him who secured the lesser number of notches faithfully cut in a black-and-white log for each man as his winnings at old sledges, which was the principal amusement as we assembled at the camp fire.

But now the youth who succeeds in undergoing himself in a cow camp gets wonderfully left. The round-up which was considered good exercise and lots of fun is now merged into a significant round-up. But the worst of all, and something the old-time cowboy never dreamed of, is retiring to winter quarters, and to sum up the duties of feeding his horse to a thousand head of cattle which roam over the prairie during the winter months. At this season of the year, it was his custom to smoke under a shady tree near the herd, with his mustang staked close by. Now he follows the hum of the mowing machine and the setting sun under him suffocated with the heat, and almost choked with hay smell, carefully erecting a hay stack six miles away from his biscuits and grease.

"Aren't you in a good deal of a hurry about getting your storm doors up?" "Not an hour too soon. My wife's mother will arrive at noon."
